Culham Innovation Centre, UK (23rd April 2004) Kaspersky Labs announced today the appointment of David Emm as Senior Technology Consultant. David will be assisting the UK office to further develop Kaspersky Labs resource of technical documentation including white papers, technical training and providing comment to the press. David's wide experience in the anti-virus industry has provided him with in-depth knowledge of the business and technical issues facing enterprises during successive generations of viruses, worms and other malicious code threats.

"I am very pleased to be joining Kaspersky at this exciting time in the company's development. Kaspersky is really starting to make inroads into the UK marketplace and I look forward to helping them further strengthen their position," says David Emm, Senior Technical Consultant of Kaspersky Labs.

David joined Dr Solomon's Software in 1990, playing various roles in the years that followed, including Technical Support Manager and Senior Technology Consultant. During this time, he was responsible for establishing and running Dr Solomon's Technical Support department, both in the UK and in the United States, and was closely involved with customer seminars and technical training, including the Dr Solomon's Live Virus Workshop.

Following the acquisition of Dr Solomon's by Network Associates, David worked as a Systems Engineer and Product Manager, before joining the McAfee Product Marketing team in January 2001, where he was responsible for the strategic marketing direction, product positioning and messaging for McAfee AVERT, McAfee scan engine and McAfee Internet gateway appliances.

Svetlana Ivanova, Managing Director of Kaspersky Labs UK comments, "We would like to welcome David as key member of our team and we look forward to taking advantage of the wealth of information about the anti-virus industry he brings with him."
