- Leading educational authority implements Email Reaction software to help non-technical users across multiple marketing teams reach out to a wider audience -

London, UK – 3rd December 2007 – Email Reaction, a specialist in enabling online customer communications, has supplied London Business School with the services to upgrade its communication system to make it more accessible to staff.

An international business school that is also part of the University of London, London Business School has been ranked amongst the top two business schools in Europe by the Financial Times. It provides business related Degree and Executive programmes, as well as hosting events, seminars, and research programmes.

The Email Reaction online solution will be used on a daily basis, primarily by UK staff, for communicating with clients and prospects on a global scale.

Functionality above the existing system, the ability to integrate with the existing internal CRM (customer relationship management) system as well as automating targeted communications to a wider audience, with more relevant content, and an easy-to-use interface were all winning factors when choosing Email Reaction.

London Business School anticipates that the improved marketing tool will provide a smoother process for prospect gathering and enable them to deliver more targeted emails which will drive additional course sales, as a result of increased email traffic.

David Lane, Director of Communications and Marketing, London Business School showed his enthusiasm for the new marketing software by saying: "Email marketing is key to communicating with our clients and prospects globally. Email Reaction has delivered a really useful email marketing solution which staff across all our marketing teams, will be able to use. I know that people will embrace the solution and appreciate the smoother and more efficient marketing processes it will deliver."

Bryan Black, managing director of Email Reaction, said: "The fact that London Business School has chosen Email Reaction proves that we are continuing to stretch out to a broad range of customers. The School now benefits from a fully functioning email marketing system that will deliver sales and help keep its marketing departments up-to-date in a world where technology and marketing go hand-in-hand together."
