Experts in online and mobile gambling, SuperCasino, have responded to the impending regulation of online gambling in Massachusetts, USA after comments from the state Gaming Commission.

Legalised online betting in Massachusetts is looking more and more likely, according to a report by the Boston Herald

(http://bostonherald.com/news_opinion/local_coverage/2014/03/gaming_chief_we_can_t_wait_for_online_betting) on fresh comments made by Gaming Commission Chairman Stephen Crosby. The decision to regulate online gambling in the country would make Massachusetts the fourth state in the USA to do so after Nevada, New Jersey and Delaware, which all have their own methods of regulating online gambling for users.

State Senator Stanley C. Rosenberg, speaking about the prospect of allowing online betting in Massachusetts, said: "It's a new frontier. I personally don't see how you avoid it. You can't control the Internet. When people turn on their computer they go where they want to go. We're just at the early stages of trying to understand how this actually works, and given that you can organize businesses inside the commonwealth, within the country, and internationally and set them up online, so we need to figure out how that all works."

SuperCasino, a leading online casino (<http://www.supercasino.com/>) based in the UK, have responded to these new comments and feel positive about the impending legalisation of online gambling in Massachusetts. A spokesperson for the company said:

"The idea of regulated online betting has been slowly spreading across the US in recent years and, if Massachusetts is to be the next in line, then it is easy to imagine it growing even further. Without this legalisation, however, it is easy for unregulated online casinos to thrive – posing a potential risk to players – and regulation reduces this risk at the same time as providing valuable tax revenue for the government."
