The reaction comes following news

(<http://www.businessweekly.co.uk/hi-tech/17147-singapore-boost-for-cambridge-and-uk-tech-startups>) that major technology investors have taken a venture across the continents to increase each other's understanding of the different markets.

Infocomm Investments Pte Ltd (IIPPL), a Singapore based company, have made the move to open offices in London with the view that it will help offer people starting out in the industry a better understanding of the differences between the markets. It is hoped that technology professionals from both countries will benefit from the greater access to pan-continental resources.

The venture is expected to prompt a number of firms from Singapore to invest in the British market, creating more jobs across the two countries. This could see the number of workers moving between them rapidly increase over the next few years as relations grow stronger.

The technology industry believes that the sharing of expertise between the European and Asian markets can only mean positive things. This is not only in terms of investment but also a progression of development too.

Sector investors, entrepreneurs, government officials and NGOs from the UK and Singapore alike will also be able to come together to create further opportunities for collaboration in the future. The strategic partnering that is central to this initiative is seen to be a great starting point for a relationship between 'two natural partners'.

Due to the accelerating nature of Singapore's market, professionals wanting to start up their own companies can expect great insights into what it takes to succeed in Asia. The innovations being made in the East and Western hemispheres will be able to flourish under a more coherent scheme of growth. As leaders in international relocation, Interdean has expressed support for the venture. 'We are all aware that technology has caused the world to become smaller so it is great news for the industry.

'Working in a field that has so much influence on our day to day lives, experience overseas will prove invaluable in the future. Through creating strong business connections across continents, both businesses and investors will be able to benefit greatly from these new relationships. Global mobility is very much a factor of the future, and at Interdean (<http://www.interdean.co.uk/moving-overseas/>) it is something we believe to be hugely important across all parts of the business sector.'
