The reaction follows a report in local publication Get Surrey detailing one of the big winners of the recent ceremony, Fetcham Park, as it took the gong for Best Town or Country Wedding Venue in the United Kingdom for 2015.

The awards ceremony played host to over 400 of the most influential people and emerging talents that the wedding industry has to offer, with the Café de Paris in London's West End chosen as the go-to venue for 2015's event on January 15. There were 27 winners in a diverse range of categories over the course of the night, with the Surrey venue walking away with one of the most sought-after awards.

A pool of experts from various backgrounds was used to create the judging panel this year, as well as comments and feedback from couples who had used different venues from around the country. The victory for Fetcham Park is particularly significant due to the fact that they are "a small, independently owned business", according to their director Laura Caudrey. "To go up against some big companies and win is fabulous, we felt like the underdog at the award ceremony."

A spokesperson for RedRoutemaster, market leaders in the providing of Routemaster buses for events, has released a statement following the report. "It's wonderful to see an independently run wedding venue take the top prize at this year's Wedding Industry Awards.

"What it highlights is that as a country we are blessed with beautiful locations to hold our special days. The industry is now brimming with smaller companies, such as ourselves, who have a vested interest in the wishes of their clients and as a result we are seeing much more attention to detail from companies all across the spectrum.

"As more and more small businesses are recognised for their efforts and contributions to the industry, the general public will be able to access their dream days at extremely affordable rates. The Wedding Industry Awards 2015 have done much to emphasise this."
