Croatia is becoming a popular location for expats and now a report has revealed that the average net pay for a worker in the country has risen. An Interdean spokesperson responds.

The average net monthly pay in Croatia rose by three per cent during the last three months of 2014, going up to HRK 5,442. Apart from top management, whose pay is 109 per cent above average, the best paid jobs were in telecommunications, 45 per cent above average, and marketing, advertising and public relations, 30 per cent above average.

Workers in possession of a college degree had a 52 per cent higher pay than those who left education after high school. It was also revealed that people who were employed in foreign private companies had a 19 per cent higher pay than average, and those employed in state owned companies were 3 per cent above.

Zagreb is the place to go to for the highest wages, with workers here earning 14 per cent above the national average. Elsewhere, companies with more than 1,000 employees generally offered staff a pay packet that is 10 per cent above what you could expect from smaller organisations.

Interdean, a leading expert in helping people achieve their dream move abroad, takes a strong interest in reports such as this. A spokesperson provided this statement: "This news is great for workers in Croatia, which goes to show that the economy is growing and hopefully people will find a bit more money in their pockets come the end of the month.

"It also adds to the allure of Croatia as a destination for people to relocate to. With such great culture and sights there's always something to do here, and the city of Zagreb is known for high quality of life and a strong economy. If you're interested in relocating to Croatia then you should get in touch with Interdean, the experts at helping you move abroad.
