A home in Bristol recently went under the hammer that featured a number of vintage fittings from the 1930s. Vintage enthusiasts flocked to admire the home, that had an original bathroom and kitchen that had not been touched for around 80 years. There were some areas of the home that needed some tender love and care, making it the perfect location for buyers who love a project.

However, one issue that the buyers did not need to consider was the installation of double glazing. One of the home's most popular features was the stained-glass windows in the hall. The artful windows featured ships in full sail in an array of colours. The previous owners invested in a high quality double glazing service, which meant the house would benefit from heat and energy efficiency whilst retaining the stain glass windows.

Accompanied by authentic wooden floor panelling, oil fired central heating and a vintage kitchen and bathroom; the home was considered somewhat of a collector's paradise. The Bristol home was priced at around £200,000 and £250,000, waiting for an owner that was looking for a character-filled property.

As experts in double glazing, DG Solutions takes a keen interest in news stories such as these. A spokesperson from the company made the following statement. "Double glazing is a feature in modern homes and is highly desirable for potential buyers. The benefits it can provide for heat and energy efficiency are well known.

"For those homeowners with period buildings and historic features, the implementation of double glazing can be a concern. However, a highly qualified and first-class double glazing firm will have the knowledge and experience to implement double glazing in homes with stained glass and antique windows. The home in Bristol is testament to the high standard of double glazing services available today."
