Zylpha (www.zylpha.com), the UK's leading legal technology innovator has announced the latest version of its bundling technology (<http://www.zylpha.com/electronic-document-bundling/>) which reduces the time taken to create document bundles from hours to minutes. Pride of place amongst a host of new features included is a new SharePoint integration. This has been designed specifically to recognise and work with the different ways that SharePoint can be set up between legal practices.

This latest version also now includes extensive import and export functionality for Microsoft Excel. This is especially useful where users seek to combine Zylpha bundles with eDiscovery platforms.

A range of enhanced data accessibility options has also been incorporated. This includes icon based file management that enables users to identify file issues easily, including password protection or outstanding file requirements that need attention.

Commenting on the new version Nigel Spicer, Zylpha's Head of Development noted, "To a great degree our development is driven by our success across an ever broader range of bundling requirements. In this case, we have recognized and met the demand from SharePoint and E-Discovery users. This user led evolution of features and functionality works extremely well, as it continuously expands the appeal of our software to a greater variety of organisations. We are confident, therefore, that this latest version will be greeted with exceptionally strong demand both from traditional practice sectors and key in-house operations such local authority legal services teams."
