Teachers spend their working days looking after our children. Come the end of term, how about a gift that is all about looking after them?

Don't Buy Her Flowers is a thoughtful gift company, with gift packages for women that encourage the recipient to sit down and take a bit of time for herself.

The Some Like It Hot (<http://www.dontbuyherflowers.com/product/some-like-it-hot-package/>) package contains delicious shortbread, tea and a Thermos mug (also perfect for taking to work when they're back in September), or help them unwind with The Recovery Package (<http://www.dontbuyherflowers.com/product/recovery-package/>), containing five luxury British products to scrub and soothe from head to toe. If you know they're a gin-lover, The Any Occasion Package (<http://www.dontbuyherflowers.com/product/the-any-occasion-package/>) covers that.

Founder Steph Douglas said:

'As parents we want to show how grateful we are for another year of care and education, so it makes sense to give a gift that is all about looking after the teacher.

'There's a growing trend for parents to club together to buy something a bit more thoughtful - most of us have parent group emails set up anyway so it's easy to organise. We have add ons and options in all of our packages, so they can be tailored to make them perfect for the recipient and suit the budget'.

Prices start from £17.50. Add ons include COOK food vouchers and MILK Beauty vouchers*.

The idea for Don't Buy Her Flowers started when Steph found herself inundated with blooms after having her first baby. It struck her as bonkers that the go-to gift when someone is doing more caring than they've ever done in their life is another thing to care for. Very quickly from launch, customers wanted to order for thank you, birthday, get well and any occasion when someone needed some TLC, as well as for new mums.
