Shocking new research produced by iBeani (https://www.ibeani.co.uk/blogs/news/tablet-injuries-elderly-report) has revealed that elderly tablet users are the most at risk of injuring themselves when using tablet devices. Based on research compiled from supporting whitepapers, the figures show that elderly tablet users face up to twice the risk of injuring themselves when using tablet devices.

These tablet injuries vary considerably and include musculoskeletal disorder, tendonitis, headaches, and insomnia. The effect of these injuries are multiplied exponentially when factoring in existing diseases and health problems commonly found in elderly users. An interesting study from our research revealed that elderly users reported higher than average pain scores compared to younger participants when completing a series of tasks involving heavy devices.

Also uncovered in the research is the increasing trend in tablet injuries not just limited to the elderly generation. One study showed that 62.8% of participants experienced some kind of tablet injury when using their tablet for less than 3 hours a day. While 75.8% of participants experienced symptoms when using their tablet for more than 6 hours a day.

Without the correct tablet habits and education, many users can seriously injure themselves from daily tablet use. To combat this, many researchers suggest not using tablets as frequently or using suitable tablet stands to take the weight and strain off the user's body.
