

91% of shoppers would be tempted back to the high street by original and British made goods

Submitted by: Haig PR

Tuesday, 30 October 2018

---

A survey has found that 91% of shoppers would visit high street stores more frequently if they could buy items that are hard to find anywhere else.

The research by retail sourcing specialist The Great British Exchange found that almost all shoppers questioned would use bricks and mortar stores more often if it meant being able to find something “unique” and two thirds said they wanted more locally made and British manufactured products on the shelves.

Matthew Hopkins, who launched The Great British Exchange in 2014 as a single sourcing point for retailers who want to stock innovative and emerging British brands, said the study sent a clear message to retailers.

He said: “Shoppers are bored with the current offering on the high street and it has never been more important for retailers to find a point of difference that sets them apart from the store down the road.

“Even more critical is the need to give consumers something they can’t find online,” he added.

The study found that 20 per cent of the shoppers surveyed did more than half of their shopping online. However, when asked about their priorities when buying food products, 82% said the least important factor was online availability. One in 5 valued provenance and the fact that the goods were locally produced above anything else when buying food products and gifts.

Special occasion shopping was one of the biggest challenges faced by consumers, according to the research, with more than half of those questioned demanding easier access to unique and British made gift products.

Shoppers also said flexible opening times, including late night opening and in-store events, would encourage them to shop on the high street more often.

Matthew added: “People often say bricks and mortar retail is dead but I disagree. It just needs to be done well and that means injecting some excitement and originality into a pastime that has lost its soul.”

Media contact:

Jenni Moulson

07771 362 501

jenni@jennimoulson.co.uk

www.thegbexchange.com

Notes to editors:

The Great British Exchange was founded in 2014 and has become a single source for newness, variety and exclusivity where retailers can easily buy the best upcoming British made products.

The Great British Exchange also helps British producers get their goods into the retail sector.

The GBE is a solution for retailers looking to find products and exclusive collections, which differentiate them from the competition.

The GBE provides a simple route and affordable route to market for emerging British brands looking to grow their business and expand their distribution.

The Great British Exchange brings 15 new brands a week into the retail arena and started working with 1000 new retailers in 2017. It currently has relationships with over 3000 retailers, including independents and department stores. The GBE sources for John Lewis, Next and TK Maxx amongst others.