

Fewer than half of UK women would be comfortable discussing ED with their partner

Submitted by: Re:Signal
Wednesday, 12 June 2019

Erectile Dysfunction (ED) affects an estimated 11.7 million men in the UK and its impact on men has been widely reported, but what about the partners of those affected? Online pharmacy MedExpress (<https://www.medexpress.co.uk/>) conducted a survey of 2,000 women in the UK (<https://www.medexpress.co.uk/health-centre/what-women-think-about-ed/>) to find out.

- One in three women said a partner had experienced erectile failure during sex on at least one occasion
- 82% said that ED shouldn't be a taboo subject, however, less than half of respondents said they would be comfortable discussing it with their other half
- Women are most concerned about their partner's physical health and emotional wellbeing, rather than the negative impact on their sex life
- Despite correctly identifying key causes of ED, almost 40% take it personally, saying it would make them feel less attractive

Erectile Dysfunction can be an isolating experience for both the men affected and their partners. Despite its prevalence - many men will experience it in some form during their lives - it remains a topic that many struggle to discuss openly.

MedExpress's study revealed a disparity between how women think ED should be perceived and how they would actually deal with it if it were to affect their partner.

Although the women surveyed displayed a strong awareness of potential causes of the condition, 38% of women would take it personally, saying that they would feel less attractive if their partner experienced ED.

The research indicated a generational divide when it comes to how ED is perceived among women. Younger women (25-34) were twice as likely as those aged 65 and over to say that it would dent their confidence. Younger women are also twice as likely to say that they would be less attracted to a sexual partner who was affected by ED. Older women were more likely to say that ED shouldn't be a taboo subject.

Dr Clare Morrison of MedExpress says: "It's not only men who are affected by ED; partners can often feel isolated and internalise self-blame, resulting in low self-confidence. If both partners are willing and able to have an honest and open discussion then this helps diminish the stigma."

About MedExpress

MedExpress is an online UK-based registered pharmacy that combines medical expertise with innovative technology. It offers prescription treatments for conditions such as erectile dysfunction, hair loss, weight loss, hay fever, asthma and acne.

Notes to the editor

- The survey was carried out by Usurv among 2,000 women around the UK, aged between 18-65+
- The study was restricted to women due to the unavailability of data pertaining to MSM
- Please find our media pack (<https://www.dropbox.com/sh/z5ksauoaspxnjv8/AADw7HUNuYWqaxyhASsEAll-a?dl=0>) with images, key takeaways from the survey, regional findings and quotes
- Please credit the research to MedExpress (<https://www.medexpress.co.uk/health-centre/what-women-think-about-ed/>)

For further information, please contact Maria Hughes at mhughes@resignal.com or 07731693281